How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	It is hoped that the Tri Darma of Higher Education can be implemented in teaching and learning activities. Teaching, research, and community service are closely related and can be carried out by students. I always try to develop good communication so that the relationship between lecturers and students can be established. I teach courses that are closely related to research. I hope to help improve the quality of research carried out by students. During the teaching and learning process, I observe, evaluate, and provide input supporting the research activities students carry out. Steps that students can take in research are to look for gaps between the theory being studied and existing phenomena so that they can determine the problem to be researched, data collection methods, and data analysis methods. Furthermore, students can gather evidence-based understanding to make necessary continuous improvements. Some of the results of research that I have carried out are that precise mechanisms and rules, clear instructions, teamwork, and objective assessment are essential features of effective classroom management that I have successfully implemented in the teaching and learning process. They must create a conducive learning environment, encourage fellow students, discuss, and be disciplined in every activity.
